Forty-Seventh Year
1924-1925

FOREWORD

In his book, "The Child in Human Progress," G. H. Payne makes the statement that the human race is approximately two hundred and forty thousand years old and civilization, as we now know it, covers a span of but a few hundred years. The vital factor in human progress toward a higher type of civilization is found in the development of Altruism, yet this is the one element that has grown at a snail's pace. The numberless organizations, laws, penalties, and constant vigilance everywhere needed to maintain order indicate that we have a long way to go before we reach the Golden Age. Phi Sigma will devote the season of 1924 and 1925 to the study of certain definite influences which tend toward the development of the altruistic attitudes in our civilization. Out of the past we hope to gain a glimpse of what the future may hold in store.
