Ricky Hughey interviewing Stan Willis

RH: Alright we’re recording. Ok, so this is Richard Hughey from Columbia College, here with Stan Willis. Um, today’s date is the April the twenty (whispers) what’s today’s date?

SW: Fifth

RH: Twenty fifth, two thousand ten. Uh, we are in Stan’s office at thirty nine south Lasalle. Um-alright let’s get started. Um-(moves microphone)- Let’s start with some basic questions, um-what would the years of your anti-apartheid activism be, basically in a-

SW: Uh, I would say, (coughs), well- let me frame it this way: I got involved in an anti-colonial work I would say in the seventies while I was a student at University of Chicago. And it included anti-apartheid work, but it wasn’t solely anti-apartheid work cause we began to uh, become aware of these struggles that were goin on in in, Mozambique, Guinea-Bissau, Namibia um- you know of course South Africa. So all of those struggles to, uh, of Africans to free themselves from colonialism, we tried to play some active part in as early as I’ve said in the early 70s.

RH: Ok, um and the location of your activism specifically, what would you say?

SW: Most of the Chicago area at that time-um- I would say from 69 70 up to about 79 or 80, a lot of the activities were in and around (coughs) the the university because I was a student at the University of Chicago during that time period, and I was living in Hyde Park, so things that were going on were largely coming out of student community as a student activist. I was one of the (coughs) leaders of the Organization of Black Students at the University of Chicago. And we did things you know around uh around Africa liberation generally.

RH: Ok, um now we are going to do a little bit of biographical information um starting with your year of birth.

SW: I was born in August 16th, 1941.

RH: Your place of birth.

SW: Chicago

RH: Chicago. Uh basically where you were raised?

SW: Uh Chicago’s west side, I grew up on the west side (coughs), I was born on the west side I was born in the county hospital. I grew up in the west side, I went to public schools, I went to Crane High School which still exists. Um, and then I moved to the south side um when I became a student at the University of Chicago and I was staying in Hyde Park for many years.

RH: Ok um-
SW: O by the way I did leave after high school and went into the United States Air Force. I spent four years in the air force then returned to Chicago, became a bus driver.

RH: Your father’s place of birth.

SW: Uh Arkansas.

RH: Arkansas and your mothers place of birth?

SW: Also Arkansas, in and around Forrest City Arkansas.

RH: Ok, um now we are going to dive back into our memory bank starting what is your earliest memory?

SW: Of anything in particular?

RW: Any anything you can remember.

SW: I think my earliest memories would be um- when I was a child we lived-until I was about four- we lived on the south side in a building called the Ellis building. E-L-I-S. (coughs), it was somewhere around thirty five hundred thirty six hundred south on Ellis. So it was near um Hyde Park. It was a little, little north of Hyde Park. (Coughs) and this building was a high rise- um I think- and I don’t know how I know this, probably somebody told me but I think it was an eight floor high rise and we were on one of the top floors. And it was close enough to the lake shore drive where I looked out the window and I could see cars going by and the cars looked like they were about the size of- ants. And I remember I was so fascinated by seeing these things movin around and I was just, so I had to be- two three or four years old. And I remember I remember cause I was kinda, I think I was just kinda in awe and curious about being that high above whatever else was goin on down on the ground. (Click)

RH: So you’re pretty far south but still pretty far east, cause if you could see the-

SW: It was yea it was pretty far east. It wasn’t that far south I mean thirty thirty some hundred south yea but it wasn’t that far. It wasn’t as far as Hyde Park which is the fifty hundreds. But I remember that it was pretty fascinating to me as a child seein the-

RH: Right. Um how would you describe the house you grew up in, or apartment I guess?

SW: The apartment? Well the one that I remember most was when we moved to the west side. Uh we moved I guess I was four or five, we moved to the near west side- um- near Ashland and Roosevelt, which is now ya know gentrified. Um, I think the hospital complex has you know kinda grabbed up all the land so it’s a whole gentrified area now. But when I grew up it was a working class black community. Probably a low working class black community. Um we lived in a basement apartment in the in the- the building was owned by a cousin and we lived in a basement apartment. It was a little, lil bungalow but there was a basement apartment. It was a very small apartment. Uh we had two small bedrooms, a living room, no dining room and a kitchen. And um- it was a you know mom and dad would I was an only child for many years, my sister was born when I- uh- when I turned- seven. I was in my seventh year when she was born so I am seven years and some months older than my sister. So I was the only child for several years at least seven then my sister was born. And um- I you know I was responsible for taking care of her as she got older you know she’s my baby sister which is drag.

RH: Ha

SW: Um, and the neighborhood- uh I went to church a lot as a child, my mom insisted and I kind of enjoyed it. Um- I also spent a fair amount of time in Paducah, Kentucky because thesere my mother has a sister there and she would ship me off to spend time with my aunt and her husband.
And I enjoyed it, he was a, he was a pastor of a church so I (cough) I became a pastor’s son during that part of the year that I spent with them, which was probably- five six seven eight you know I was very young. Uh and then as I grew up the, I began to meet uh some other boys in the neighborhood, probably at age ten and eleven you know before I really kinda began to stretch out a little bit. And uh you know gangs began to emerge and I was a member of a gang- and we had gang fights- and um some of them were pretty violent-um- (clears throat). You know but I went to school because my mom and dad insisted that I go to school and come home at a certain time.
Other other moms and dads, some of the kids didn’t have a dad in the house, but I did. And my mom and dad were, ya know great moms and dads you know, they were not disciplinarians but they kept pretty strict control over me-um- but then not enough to keep me from being a member of a gang. And so it was good you know I mean some battles I lost- uh- one friend in particular was killed in a gang kind of conflict, shot to death. I think I was probably about twelve, thirteen, maybe fourteen you know, I remember that very well.

I also remember-the murder of Emmet Till. I was 12 and I think Emmet Till was twelve and I remember vividly because it was ah probably the most talked about event throughout the entire African American community during that time, but more importantly I remember it, I remember it because my mother was a friend of his grandmother, they went to church together, and my mother new his mother. And so it brought it closer to home, and I remember it also because my sister who was probably four or five-um- my dad made the mistake of taking her with him, cause he would take her with him all the time, that was she was a daddy’s girl- he took her with him to, to the wake. And you know it was an open casket kind of wake and you know, she was horrified. And it impacted me because she I guess she learned that this kid who was so brutally um beaten and murdered was the same age as her brother. So she would get very uh-very uh afraid when I was out after dark. So it began to restrict my activities because my mom made me come home because my sister would be crying in the evenings so I wasn’t too happy about that.

So but it was generally, you know it was a nice a, I enjoy it, my growing up in reflection was very positive.

RH: So you and your sister were pretty close?

SW: Yea we still are. She works here occasionally part time. Uh we had two other, my mom had two other children where I had two younger brothers you know after my sister. And we all we are a pretty close family. My mom and dad have passed but the siblings are very close.
RH: So uh I sorta have to ask um, why what were the main reasons you would say you kinda got into, got into the gangs around your neighborhood.

SW: (clears throat) The gangs kind of emerged um- as part of young boys kinda hanging out you know just like they do now; there are certain kids that for whatever reason enjoy hangin out with each other, you know everybody has friends. And- sometimes those groups would be hangin out or they would have, I could remember having these baseball games with other kids, and sometimes the tensions of the baseball games would spill over and then there would fights and arguing about you know was he safe on first base or not. And um if somebody let’s say for example let’s say it’s a baseball game, if there’s a fight and this group of kids lives some place else and thers a fight, then you got something that’s going to resemble a certain group cohesiveness in relation to this other group. And so that began to be gang rivalry because then you couldn’t go into their neighborhood because you’ve had a fight with them and, nah I don’t know exactly how it emerged but people startin naming themselves based on the guys that they were, based on the guys that they hung out with. So there were several groups that had names, and they would put their names on their little jackets. We were called the gents. G-E-N-T-S. Because we thought we were gent gentlemen I guess. And then there were other groups had other names. And sometimes if there is a fight between someone in your group then you would step in to protect them or assist them. And that’s kinda how it emerged, I don’t think it was, I don’t think people were thinking lets organize a gang. There was no drugs.

RH: Right

SW: Like there is now where gangs are organized around drug distribution. There were people for sure that were using- I think probably the worst thing that people, I remember people using was marijuana. I don’t remember anything about, anything about cocaine or heroin anything like that. But it was marijuana. But nobody was selling it. There were no groups that were controlling turf and all that like you have now, which you know creates a whole different kind of situation. But we did have uh- territorial fights. So if you came into my neighborhood and you were from any neighborhood, especially if we had had conflicts then that would create a gang rivalry and gang fight. But it was strictly turf and I have no idea what turf emerged you know, I mean um people tend to be organized around land I guess. You know tribal groups do it, national groups do it. So we did it you know this is our neighborhood, don’t come unless we give you permission.

Um and then there would be fights. The weapons start coming in probably as we were getting a little older, you sixteen, fifteen sixteen. There were some guys in the group- that I know had guns. Not many not like it is today. I could I could remember who they were, and I can almost remember how many there were. There was two or three, that I was aware of. And you know they had nothing sophisticated you know sometimes a six shooter or something you know, there were no automatic weapons in those days yea. And there were shooting, but most guys relied on, and this you know might sound unbelievable in today’s gang kinda culture: we did a lot of fighting. We did literally fist fights.

RH: Fist fights yea.
SW: Yea so you learn how to fight, you learn how to box. Boxing doing, when I grew up was um what a, prize fighting. Was a sport that was very very popular in many communities. Certainly was popular in the African American community. Um because TVs were coming out and one of the, the more popular uh TV show or sport was the fights. You know they came out there a couple times a week. I can even remember who produced those: Gillette. The razor you know.

RH: Right

SW: And so you knew about, uh during my times you knew about Joe Lewis, you knew about {name I cant make out}, you knew about Sugar Ray Robinson, and these were figures that were as popular as the basketball stars are now. You know the Kobe Bryant, but we didn’t have Kobe Bryant cause we didn’t have basketball. Blacks didn’t play basketball in the NBA until later. Um but we knew about the boxers. So we boxed and gang rivalry tended to end up with two or three guys squarin off and just boxin and trying to beat the other one to a pulp. Very, very rarely did it get beyond fist fights, you know maybe somebody pickin up a bat or creating some kind of weapon, you know.

RH: Right

SW: Um and then you know there were a few guys that had guns and we knew that had guns but primarily it was fist fights.

RH: So I guess um- a thing that is sorta different about gangs is you would say that a lot of gangs back then started out because of something that started out innocent like baseball games.

SW: Mmhmm, mmhmm.

RH: And they moved to that something that ended up more violent.

SW: Yea they just, they they clearly, I know the gang that I was in started out as a social club. You know I like these guys, we hang out together. We probably lived in the same block you know. We knew each other’s, parents knew this group of kids- um we knew the parents and we saw the parents coming out on the street we were respectfully you know, how are you Mrs. Smith? You know and if we were doing anything that was not permitted we would stop doing it. Um and so that group of kids, those were my buddies and so if we gonna have something to identify us as a group then that would become my gang. You know cause they were going to protect me. We had you know we would get our little- well they weren’t starter jackets but they were like starter jackets and you would literally get some water colors you know paint. Not water colors cause that would wash away but paint and somebody who was artistic enough would do the name of social club on the back of the jacket.

RH: O wow.

SW: So then when you go to school everybody say you know he’s in the Gents. And you know it was, I think it was a way of setting yourself off, you know we didn’t have boy scouts, we didn’t have those clubs or organizations that were organizing supervised by parents. You know poor communities don’t have that very often. So we had our own way of organizing ourselves.

RH: Was there almost a status symbol just to be just to be in a certain gang.

SW: Yea we thought it was. I don’t know if it was then but we thought it was. We thought it set us off; we thought it gave us a certain amount of recognition, a certain amount of respect. Cause you did get respect if you were good in sports.

RH: Right

SW: You got respect if you were a good fighter, a good boxer. I was on the wrestling team. You didn’t get much respect for that but people didn’t pay much attention to wrestling. But football you know if you was popular; a good football/basketball player you know people admired you ya know everyone wanted to be admired by their peers. And so putting on a gang; we didn’t really call it a gang, we called it a club. Put on a club jacket and so we all together, especially if you had several guys in the same club like fifteen or twenty-

RH: Right

SW: And then you know we might be going down the street together you know fifteen twenty guys, and people you hear people sayin those are the gents.

RH: Yea

SW: It was very uh very kind of gratifying. And if you somebody bothers you you obviously have to protect your guys.

RH: Right

SW: And that’s kinda how it spilled over. And typically it would be fights but there were some violence and and there were, I can think of two deaths as I was growing up from gang violence, but nothing related to drugs at all. In fact most of the guys I knew, they used marijuana occasionally. I never used marijuana even as a kid which is kinda- different from-

RH: It’s an important distinction

SW: kids that grew up later than me. But I didn’t, I didn’t use it because (clears throat) I was a little different in that I grew up in and around the church. My mom kept me in church. And I had- I guess adopted the values of the church so I didn’t smoke, I didn’t drink, I didn’t use any drugs, until I was probably about seventeen I started smoking.

RH: Cigarettes.

SW: Cigarettes. Yup nothing, nothing more than cigarettes. And around that time you know I probably started drinking with the other guys but I would be around these guys and they would be drinking, everybody smoked. Some guys would steal, little petty stuff goin to the store and steal a cupcake and I would do that. I did nothing that was illegal or conflicted with the social norms in my family. And they teased me about it but you know they respected me because I was one of the leaders of the gang cause I could, I was a good fighter. And that was you know kind of critical. And I was popular with the girls and you know that was pretty important for us. So even if you didn’t smoke or drink if you had those other thing goin on then you were still pretty popular.

RH: One final thing about gangs: did you parents really know and if they did how did they react?

SW: I’m not sure that they knew, we never said anything about it. We tried to keep that sorta thing from parents.

RH: Really?

SW: (laughs)

RH: (laughs)

SW: I don’t really know what they would have done but I think they knew, she knew, my mom who did more of the super- supervised me more than my dad cause dad was working all the time.
Mom knew that there were certain, dad did too but mom knew better than dad that there were certain guys that I spent time with almost all the time and she knew them. She knew, she knew of their parents, she didn’t know their parents that well but she knew who they were. Uh like parents should I think. So she might have surmised that I was in something you know I didn’t try to hide my jacket from her, but I don’t think she thought much of it. I think she just thought you know I think she thought that the guys I spent time with were good guys and they were. She didn’t have any problems with them, they didn’t come around, they weren’t cussing, getting into any trouble that she was aware of. And so you know she thought that they was cool. Now I do remember, uh I worked at a local laundry after school and I got into a fight with an older guy, at the job. (Laughs) and he chased me out of the plant. And when I got home, cause he had hit me and bust my lip or something, all the guys came to my house cause they were ready to go after him and she told me your not goin out. So I couldn’t go out. So I think she may have concluded that there were guys that were very close to me and protect me. But she knew them all.

RH: Right

SW: But I think she also sensed that this was not a good thing for me since she knew that the guy had hit me and my guys were coming to the house so she just said you aren’t going out today.
And that was the end of that and I didn’t go out.

RH: And so you kept your church values basically throughout your whole-

SW: I think I still have them, in one way or another, in terms of fair play. It may have dictated um my going into civil rights law and it probably dictated my advocacy around human rights and a lot of other stuff. I don’t know I haven’t analyzed it like that. But for sure that was the, the first kind of cultural values that I had grew from the house like most people. And I know mine were greatly influenced by the church because my parents values were greatly influenced by the church and church ideas. I think many people are like that; they might not identify with the church but people tend to have church influence whether your Jew, Catholic whatever. And those values that you learn, cause church is, theology has a lot to do with values. And it’s there and you know I think it’s good cause it kept me from stealing, it may have kept me from using drugs and all that other stuff you know so that’s cool.

RH: Yea. To segway into uh civil rights, when would you say you first witnessed an act that you considered violating someone’s civil rights?

SW: (Clears throat) I don’t know if I’ve very many-um- I knew of some. I mean I knew about Emmet Till. (Pause) I didn’t know for example growing up, I wasn’t, I didn’t grow up thinking would be a lawyer. That wasn’t an ambition of mine, and I didn’t even have the ambition of going to college. Cause we didn’t-many- going to college in the working class community wasn’t always something that was considered likely or even desired. My parents cause they were-they were from the south, and they had been-my father had been in the south as a share cropper. My mom was a-lived her parents had a small farm. Neither one of them finished high school. So there for me and the other children was that we would finish high school, and if we finished high school that they would believe that that would be sufficient for us to get a decent job and all the rest of it, get married and have children. Never do I recall my parents, either of them talking about college.

The college came when I uh, when I finished high school I went to junior college for a week or two and I dropped out and then I went into the military. And then in the military I began to encounter crystallized ideas of maybe I should go to college and didn’t have a clue about how to do it. Really didn’t know anybody who had gone to college. We didn’t have college graduates that I was aware of in my neighborhood. And so I had to figure all that out. And I took a couple of courses while I was in the military at local community colleges. And when I came back I started driving a bus; I was married by then. I got married while I was in the military. I started driving a bus, and there were guys that were bus drivers that were fairly well educated. Well you know-bus driving was a job where you could get paid as though you-there was-there was- your pay was comparable to pay you would get if you were in a profession. Because there were guys who had college degrees, but because they were black they couldn’t get in to certain sectors. So bus driver was a job you could get that would get-that you could be paid, you know, kind of a decent salary by driving a bus. So we had a lot of very smart bus drivers. A number of college graduates and some of them were actually teaching school while they were driving the buses. And so in in being in that company it helped me to kind of crystallize ideas of going to college with a reasonable expectation of finishing college. And I did I stayed with it-took a while-took me six years because I was in city college for three years and then I went to the University of Chicago. And then I went to graduate school. And my family used to tease me because it appeared to them that I was never going to finish school; I was constantly going to graduate school and law school and all this other stuff. But I enjoy school after I started going on a regular basis and started being successful.

RH: Um to back track a little bit, um why in retrospect do you think you joined the armed forces?
SW: I think I joined the armed forces because in a working class community, certainly a black working class community, you don’t have a lot of-you don’t imagine a lot of options because you don’t see them around you. There are no school teachers, there are doctors, there are no lawyers, there are really nobody but people going to jobs, mostly factory jobs. In Chicago the black middle class, the professional black middle class, largely lived on the south side. Nobody lived on the west side. West side was kind of considered not the place to live you know because the people-this is the way black people considered it I think.

RH: Right.

SW: If you were on the west side you know there was a lot more poverty, a lot more unruliness on the west side. So the people on the south side, the professionals, not only did they not live on the west side, they didn’t come to the west side.

RH; At all.

SW: Hardly ever. And we didn’t go to the south side either. Cause we thought they were stuck up and satiety and all of that. So the black doctors, the black lawyers, teachers, none of them lived on the west side so we didn’t have any of these as role models. So I think that um just growing up you know you didn’t have role models so you didn’t-you didn’t imagine certain things. See in a middle class house, because I have a middle class house and that I’m a middle class person, my kids as they grow up they are around books all the time. They are around people who can tutor them and insist that they do certain things, not only assist but can say let’s sit down and do the algebra now. You know work through it. And the expectation in my household is that you are going to college. You know, you might not like the idea but you’re going to college. And I think as they grow up the kids go, because all my children went to college. They are all affected by the expectations of the household, you know coming from the parents. Because their parents went to college, and very often their friends went to college So when they grow up they just- you know are automatically thinking about college and applying to colleges and all of that. That’s not true in all com- that’s not true in all classes. When I grew up there was no discussion about college theres no expectation about college. My parents are glad that I went, but they didn’t plan for it, they didn’t put money aside for it, none of that. Because it just wasn’t part of working class culture, at least in my neighborhood. It might have been more a part of working class culture if you were on the south side because there was more of a mixture of working class people you know blacks working in factories like the steel mills and the meat packing industry. But they were also mixed up with the doctors and the lawyers. And my guess is that if we had been on the south side that the expectation may have been greater or different than you know than living on the west side.

So um, I don’t know if that answered the question or not.

RH: Ha no its fine. It’s not a big deal. So um how did you adjust to live when you came back from the service? Um SW: O I know the question, how did I decide to go to the service I think it was. There were people who were friends of mine who, I had my best friend went to the military before I went to the military. And my second best friend went I think around the same time.

SW: So as we were finishing high school, there were guys who had gone to the military that we knew. Cousins or you know, just a little older, that were coming back with all these stories about the fun that they had and the women that they met and all of that. And since we didn’t have all these other options, of college and you know expectations, military was a very natural outlet for us, a natural option because military wasn’t competing with going to college because going to college wasn’t on the table. So more of the working class kids go to the military more than probably the middle class kids, you know because this is a reasonable option. You go away at about the time you are 18, if you finish school, you know there is a void you know there’s nothing to do because you’re used to going to school and you know sometimes you go and hang out at the school which is not a good thing. So I would say many of the young men went off to the military or they got jobs right away. You know they feel like it was satisfactory and they didn’t feel like they needed to go and play. And so it was- I think it was a quest for something new after high school. Something that I had heard about that sounded exciting to do-travel you know cause I heard at least if you go in the military during your first tour of duty you would go overseas at least once which was the rule. So you got a chance to go overseas and travel and all that. It’s just exciting, it was different.

After high school I would say things were pretty boring, for lack of a better term. You know so the military seemed like a better way to do it. And I’m kinda glad I went, I had a good time in the military. I didn’t go to Vietnam, I could have gone to Vietnam- it was during the Vietnam era, but I didn’t go. I met some great guys from all over the country. So you know it was good, it was good for me. I don’t advise or encourage people to go into the military now because I have a different view on the military but then it was a good way to get out of the neighborhood.

RH: Afterwards, um I know you talked a little bit about it already but why did you take the job as a bus driver?

SW: Um it was available. I was looking for a job. I had been trained in the military to be a communications operator- I was a teletype operator. And there weren’t too many teletype jobs in the civilian sector, in fact the civilian jobs- the military jobs don’t transfer to the civilian sector in the way the recruiters said they do. I mean they would say that because they were trying to get kids to join the military but they really don’t. So I didn’t have a job- I had applied to a couple things. I think I was going to apply to be an insurance agent you know selling insurance, but that seemed kinda boring to me. And uh I don’t know who told me but you know the bus drivers- CTA was hiring and I applied and I passed the test and I got the job. And it was a good job, I enjoyed it. Driving the bus, meeting people, no real confining environment like when I worked at the laundry you know you go to this one plant and you you’re here all day and its pretty boring. You’re out and you never know what’s going to happen from day to day you out on the bus you’re meeting people, meeting a lot of girls, hitting on girls you know so it was a great job. You know and the pay was good.

RH: So at this point in your life what was your relationship like with your parents?
SW: Now?

RH: At that point I’m saying when you were-

SW: O at that time my relationship was great with my parents. Um my father was very um- I guess permissive is the word. My dad loved me like my mom did but he did not spend a lot of time supervising me, my mom did the supervising. And he didn’t spend hardly any time disciplining me. My mom did a lot of that but you know he was around you know he would take me with him you know sometimes if he had odd jobs he would take me. Very protective-um- so my relationship was great with my parents. I had a child at a very early age so when I went to the military before I finished high school I had a son that I had to take care of. And so when I got back you know parents were glad cause my mom- my mother- um- took it kinda hard when I joined the military because she was afraid I might not come back.

RH: Right

SW: Because she had a nephew that did not come back and I think that weighed heavy on her. Cause this was right after- well this wasn’t directly after world war two but it was not far away for her. Because this was in-I joined the military in 1960. The war had ended you know almost two decades earlier but it was very vivid in her mind and she lost a nephew I think in the Korean war which was just a few years earlier in nineteen fifty-one, fifty-two, you know during that time period.

So she was very very afraid of when I decided to go off to the air force-when they took me to the airport you know to ship out to go to training it was pretty sad you know my mom was crying, my girlfriend was crying, I was scared you know why did I decide to do this. I had never been on an airplane before so it was a pretty dramatic event, getting on the plane and leaving my family. But my relationship was good with my parents-it always had been.

RH: So after, or I guess why you were a bus driver you were still going to school at Crane College?

SW: When I when I started driving a bus, as soon as I got a regular schedule because you don’t get a regular schedule right away your on what’s called the board. They put your route up on a daily basis because you don’t have a regular route. As soon as you get a chance to pick, meaning pick your own schedule- it wasn’t the best schedule but it was a schedule that was predictable. As soon as I got that I went and enrolled in school. And I think I was- I was probably taking evening classes cause I don’t think I was able to- um I may have been taking day classes cause I think I was driving the bus in the evening. Because it’s hard to get a bus route during the day because the most senior drivers prefer to have the route during the day so they can go home at 4, 4 o clock or earlier. So the rookies end up driving in the evening. So we were off during the day and that was cool cause I think I enrolled in class during the day and I think if my schedule changed I would switch around, might go in the evening.

RH: Right. So I read in part of your biography uh that you uh took part in a campaign to name the new part of the college Malcolm X College.
SW: Mmhmm Mmhmm.

RH: How did you get involved in that and was that basically your first activist esqe- sort of-

SW: That was probably, that was probably um my second or third I was involved in for sure, politically. I think the first one would have to be-I think some time in maybe 65- I was driving from 64 to 68. There was on the news-Robert Kennedy had gone to the southern states to investigate claims of-poverty and starvation in certain parts of the black community. And it made the news and everyone was aware of it. And I was a bus driver and I remember reaching out to one or two community groups that were organizing a campaign to ship goods- food goods and other goods to the south to black people that were starving in the south. And I came back to the station and organized a campaign at the bus depot for drivers to you know spend money or donate money for canned goods you know all those canned goods and clothes were collected and then they were shipped down to the southern states out of this local community group that I had contact with. So I think that was the first kind of crystallization of me as a young black man taking a responsibility to do something to help a black community that I had no direct contact with and didn’t know anyone in the community except I knew that there were black people there starving based on the reports. So I think that’s the early stages of developing this kind of consciousness that doesn’t require direct involved that can be distant like south Africa for example.

And then when I went to school-probably uh I think I started school in 65 cause I came home in 64- got the job in 64- and I think I had a schedule maybe by the end of 65. I think in 66 there was a historian that came on campus, a young white woman. And she was speaking on-she was lecturing on negro history and I went to the lecture, it was a guest lecture. And I was amazed that the negro, which is me, had such a great history. Because we weren’t taught history in the schools. There was no black history taught in any of the northern schools, I think it was taught in the southern schools because the southern schools were segregated and the southern schools had black teachers. We didn’t have black teachers in the urban northern schools, not very many. And even if we had some they weren’t teaching black history. Um so black people were excluded from the American history books except they were mentioning blacks that were slaves so you entered the history as a slave and that’s where they left you as a slave. So she was talking about all the great things that black people had done. You know I think it was more- it wasn’t a social history it was more of a kind of typical chronological you know black people invented this and did this. All the good things that showed that we had the same level of intellect of other people in terms of industry ect. But I was fascinated I said my goodness because the only person I knew in history was a book I had I think it’s the only book I had on history-was up from slavery a history of Booker T Washington. And I really admired him for what he did coming out of slavery. So I as a result of that lecture in my- thirst for more of what she had given in her lecture, I organized the Negro history club. And I don’t remember how I organized I think I just I knew some student by this time I think I just said lets start meeting and lets study or own history. And people were you know people were respondent. And you know I think we would meet maybe once a week in one of the classrooms. And there would be several students. We would find books and we would read together and discuss them. And that’s kind of how it got off the ground. And as a result of that I became associated with the idea that we should be at least studying history and be concerned with our own history. And at some point the student movement was developing around us. Because what we were doing at Crane College was apparently happening at the other colleges because there was a lot of stuff going on around the world. And at some point someone suggested that I run for student government because we were developing ideas about what black people should be doing. The nationalism was developing. In fact the Negro history club probably the end of that year or in early 67-we had changed the name to the Afro-American History club, which suggested a change in our thinking about ourselves. We were no longer identifying as negroes. And um somebody suggested I run for the student government as student government president so we could have more influence in the student population and maybe convince the other students, cause you know it’s a predominantly black school, to study history or be concerned about issues that relate to black people. And I did. We had a very vigorous campaign. I had a vice president a presidential candidate, a secretary and a treasurer. And they all campaign similarly. And I think our campaign was called the progressive party and they were called something else. And uh this was the fall of 67 and we won. And so I became the leader of the student body. And they gave me an office in the building.

RH: With a window?

SW: Yea with a window. And I promptly put up a big picture of Malcolm X. I don’t have the picture here but there’s Malcolm back there in the corner. This is a big-it’s like a poster. Because we were very much- admired Malcolm X and so we would listen to his records of speeches. And we would listen to them in the student day room where there were other students because we wanted other students to hear the speeches as well. So we were really trying to educate the other students by bringing these speeches in and having these discussions you know. And I think it was working to a great extent. But there was a reaction. And the reaction came from- partly from the some of the white faculty didn’t understand but in particular the white woman who was like the faculty member of the student newspaper. And she had um-

RH: She did not understand.

SW: She did not understand. And the newspaper- some of the articles were attack articles. I still have a lot of this stuff. Because they thought that I didn’t like- I was trying to alienate or didn’t represent the white students. There weren’t that many white students. But we didn’t really care about the white students in terms of alienating them. We were really trying to focus on our history and what we should be doing as black students. And then in March of the next year, we learned that the national guards in South Carolina - at the university of South Carolina, they had murdered students on campus- they had shot students on campus because there was a peaceful protest. This was in Orangeburg South Carolina. And we were outraged by it so we decided to have a demonstration. And we- one of the members of the group his uncle had owned a local funeral home so we asked him to ask his uncle if he would loan us a casket and we were going to take the coffin and march through the community to symbolize the death of these students. He couldn’t loan us a coffin because they were too expensive but he gave us the container that the coffin came in and it looked like a coffin. So we marched through the community with what looked like a coffin. And it was very dramatic. So the newspaper got a picture of me marching with the coffin surrounded by not just students but faculty. And they criticized they attacked me. I didn’t care. But it just showed that we were very strong. I mean we were developing a very strong cohesive student group that included faculty supporters that included staff people like the secretaries the people that work in the engineering room. And had a fair amount of support from the administration because we were not on the attack we were really trying to rebuild the sense of self esteem with a group of students that didn’t have a lot of it. But trying to help them understand that there was a responsibility that they had to try to uplift the community. And I think most people at some point begin to get it. Because we- the support we got eventually from the faculty was great.

So it was during that time I would say- in fact I know for sure cause I did research recently. Someone asked me to write a section of a book on this. And I started researching on this, but i didn’t do the writing. But I drafted a letter to the president of the school and to the faculty. And in that letter demands were made, many of them had to do with student involvement. You know in the whole school. To integrate students into the school’s decision making. But there was one demand that was made that school-the new school cause we knew that there was a new school gonna be built-that the new school be named after Malcolm X. So we started the struggle around the student demands but we focused a lot on fighting for- and I think we also demanded that the new president of the school that they make an active effort to recruit a black person to be president of the school. And that they have more black faculty. All of that was in the demand. But that was very common throughout the black student world. All of over the country people were doing that. And so eventually the name after a lot of struggle, decided to the name the school Malcolm X. I think it had a lot to do with the fact that our base was so solid. It wasn’t just a few radical students. It was you know support coming from like I said faculty and administration exedra You know. And it was even more amazing because Malcolm X had been assassinated only 2 and a half before we started advancing his name. And Malcolm was not very popular- he was not popular in the white community at all because they feared him. But he wasn’t that popular in the black community. So to put his name out there to name a school was pretty bold for these students to do that. Given Malcolm’s reputation you know they didn’t have the Malcolm X movie that came out much later and all that. So he was really feared by many black people. So I think many black people probably in the communites probably thought we losing our minds, but you know the school is named Malcolm X.

RH: Right it still is. So that was basically your first organization that you sort of recruited for and kind of started-

SW: Yea but at the same time this was 67, I went into government in 68- we were really organizing hard because Dr. King was assassinated a month after we had the demonstration in March he was assassinated in April, so all hell broke loose. But at the same time during that same year in 67 going to 68 I was working at the buses and I think in late 67 we had had a wild cat strike at the bus depot and I was part of that wild cat strike. Because there was a controversy about one of our drivers, they had fire one of our drivers and we told them we wouldn’t till they hired him and we didn’t and they hired him back. And then later in 60- later in 68 we were having all these conflicts with the-not with the company, not with CTA so much but with our union. You know the union was-the union itself the union officials were all white. The demographics of the drivers was rapidly changing. We were probably at least 50% of the population but the union was all white so what the union officials did is they allowed white drivers-white retired drivers to vote at the union hall on the issues that we thought were important. So this was their mechanism of keeping the black vote diluted. And you know we were just outraged by that. And so we end up on going a wild cat strike during the summer of 68 at the same time we were engaged in the battle of naming the college. And I was one of the organizers of that strike. And that strike lasted most of the summer. It was a huge strike. It closed down the west and south side of Chicago completely. We tried to close down the north side but the north side was- there weren’t that many black communities on the north side. When we would go to the station on the north side we just weren’t as successful. And we would get arrested you know just going up in those white neighborhoods. But we closed down the city-

RH: Just for being there?

SW: Yea yea. I mean we go down to set up a picket, police come right away. You know you leave or we arrest you. And so it was supported around the communities so it was very difficult.
So the strike lasted and this is on the present mayor’s father, and during that same year, I mean that same summer, we eventually convinced the L drivers to go on strike. So they went on strike for a period of time, not like they didn’t strike long. And the cab drivers went out on strike during the same period. So transportation was like stopped.

RH: Wow

SW: And it was on the eve of the democratic national convention that was going to be held in Chicago-

RH: O wow.

SW: And so I’m sure it freaked the mayor out because he was a big time old bosses. So then of course the-what we know about that-what most people know about that period is that the democratic national convention a lot of the radical white students came into town because the war was heating up. And there was these anti war demonstrations and the Chicago police reacted to them and beat up a lot of them-

SW: So many people think 68 is the time the white radical students were attacked by the police but the other important thing that happened was that the black bus drivers had closed the city down prior to the white students getting here. Probably pissed the mayor off. So when the white kids got here he was so angry. Because many of the white students came to us to help us with the strike, to their credit. And so we asked them to go up north and man the picket lines and they did and they weren’t arrested so they were helpful in that regard. And that was their way of showing solidarity which was good. So I was organizing on two fronts: I was organizing in the work place with the bus drivers and I was organizing more with the student organizers- more my organizing.

RH: Right

SW: The bus drivers I was organizing with other people. Kind of taking leadership on some parts of it but not all of it. But in the student community I was considered the leader of the student during that time period and-I accepted that responsibility and we moved forward. That was the same time that Fred Hampton came on campus in 67. And so there developed some-at least in some people’s minds competition for leadership cause I didn’t realize at the time but Fred and Bobby Rush came on campus to organize because this school had a reputation for having very militant students. And I so I saw them on campus—just assumed they were there taking classes but as I learned later they weren’t there taking classes they were there to organize. And when I left in 68 I graduated and went to the University of Chicago uh they apparently stepped up their organizing cause many of my followers either didn’t join the party or did join the party.

RH: Right
SW: So many of them did join the party after I left. And so the student movement as such really just kinda went away because the leadership—I left and then many of the leaders that were with me joined the Black Panther party. And that kinda ended that for a long spell.

RH: So when you went to the University of Chicago is that when you sorta learned about the South Africa conflict?
SW: Well I knew about it— I don’t think we did very much organizing around that— we knew about it if there was organizing- the organizing was I think largely learning more about it studying— we certainly were studying as much as we could about Africa generally, because we had not done that. But it was— once I went to the University of Chicago there was much more organized efforts around the anti-colonial movement. I don’t think we made a distinction because the Portuguese colonies were fighting for liberation and South Africa and Namibia what was called South West Africa. So I don’t think we made the distinction that we were just focusing on apartheid. Now after the Portuguese colonies got independence, after Angola, Mozambique, and after Guinea-Bissau got independence which was in probably the late 70s the early 80s then we—the only country left was South Africa, then all the focus was on South Africa. But before then I would say throughout the 70s we were you know like I said Prexy had headed the Mozambique Support Committee. So we were more spread out because there were I guess 5 or 6 countries that had not gotten independence. All the French and the English countries had gotten independence in 1960. Um the Portuguese for a lot of reasons: one they had a dictator, Salazar, 2 they were a very backwards economy compared to the British and French, so they felt they really needed their colonies, they couldn’t survive without their colonies at least that was their few. And the movement in Portugal was slowly developing; you know it wasn’t a strong progressive movement until later. And maybe the resistance in the colonies the helped strengthen the movement in the homeland. So I think after Guinea-Bissau put up such a strong resistance in Guinea, little small small Guinea, it really broke the back of the Portuguese suppression, and the movements in Portugal were gaining and they kicked Salazar out. Right after that the Portuguese control just diminished in Mozambique, Angola and Guinea-Bissau got their independence. So then we were able to focus just on South Africa.

RH: So when you were at the University of Chicago during the 70s was there a specific organization you joined that was specifically devoted to the anti-colonialism or was there—SW: No it was just the Organization of Black Students.
RH: Just black students—
SW: You know we did various things. You know I can remember having different-periodically different protests cause they would emerge. You know there might a campaign against shell oil or there might be a campaign against various things that we thought would help you know support these movements. So we would join those, you know the black students would and many of the white students were slowly doing it, you know like SDS and all those they were joining as well. But a lot of focus obviously was on the- especially as you get into the late 70s-the war became a main focus so many of the progressive groups. Somebody would have been within the context of the Organization of Black Students on campus at the University of Chicago that I did all the work at that time.

RH: Did you have like a specific role that you kinda did, like a certain specific thing within the organization or it was just kinda whatever needed-

SW: No it was just whatever came up that was supportive we would try to get students to join. I was one of the leaders of the Organization of Black Students. All the students weren’t as political-the student-black student body wasn’t that great-I mean wasn’t that large. But many of them were you know. I think if you gave leadership people would you know-if it was reasonable they would join. So we had a lot of activities going on around different things related to the-and we had a little core group that studied together. You know these are the more progressive black students. You know we studied Marx-ism, Leninism, there all socialist thoughts. We studied the thoughts of African socialists like Incruma, Sacuta Raymond and then the socialist thinking in the African context. We were following developments in Cuba. You know so we were well aware of what was going on with Cuba and Seguvara and Fidel Castro. And so we knew what was going on in all of these regions, and if something came up like theres a speaker on campus. I remember meeting more than once with Della Omar. And Della Omar was a South African lawyer who was representing the ANC.

RH: OK

SW: And he would come to the United States seeking support you know and giving reports on what was happening. And that was probably as we were focusing more on South Africa. That was probably the late 70s early 80s you know when he would come. You know I think he became chief justice or something in the government. I don’t know what he’s doing now. So when people would come in we would-because we were-people knew we were progressive around these issues it was easy to get an audience with you know Chris Honey who was the head of the armed department for struggle. And then we would act accordingly. Very often the action would be having a demonstration at the Consulate, you know right down here on Michigan. I remember spending many days doing that. Or it might be something that just depending on you know if the rugby team was coming, and people you know if we knew about it, if people brought it to campus we might organize a delegation to go out and protest that. So we did things kinda as they developed. But we didn’t have anything as ongoing like Prexy had like the Mozambique Support Committee. You know his mission was- his office was providing literature and ongoing and 24 7 work around it, we didn’t do that. Because we were a student group I mean we had other stuff we were working on as well. Because you know we were fighting to get administration to get more black professors and trying to get more black students at to- you know all that so we had all those tasks that we undertook as students, and the South African- the anti-colonial movement was one of the things that was international. And of all the international things we spent more time on Africa, the continent of issues than we did on for example things that happened in the Caribbean you know where there were struggles going on or things that were happening in Cuba. We knew about it but I don’t think there was a great deal of organizing around it.

RH: So was there a time that focus ever shifted to a specific like South Africa- towards the end of the 70s or early 80s?

SW: I think so I think probably I don’t know exactly when but I think after the Portuguese collapsed I think the anti colonial movement in the United States shifted to South Africa.

RH: And for you personally like-

SW: Yea. But I don’t-the work I think the shift was probably for me and as a student was work around again around OBS, Organization of Black Students, and a lot of that had to do with picketing around the Consulate. And then that shifted in 83 when I became a lawyer so I wasn’t working so much with-I started doing things in a legal capacities. So I would do things-I became a member of the-I organized a chapter of National Conference of Black lawyers probably in 86 87. And then we started doing things as NCBL. So our shift then was more as an organization. We had delegations going to different conferences. I didn’t go to conferences. What I did locally-what all the chapters did-we took the responsibility to go to particularly pickets at the Consulate and maybe other gatherings around South Africa, anti apartheid gatherings. Our responsibility shifted to being there and being able to defend people.

RH: Right

SW: And that’s what we did I mean-

RH: That’s an important role.

SW: Yea it was a critical role. And we did that I know um in looking at some of the notes that our Boston chapter you know got several people out of jail. We didn’t have that many attacks here I’m not sure-I can’t explain why. But in other cities picketing around the Consulate led to arrests. It didn’t lead to a lot of arrests here; at least I don’t recall a lot of arrests. But we were always there to you know support and defend and if necessary go to court and go to trial if necessary.

RH: Right

SW: To defend people who were demonstrating. So my role shifted I would say considerably from the time I was at U of C as a student to when I became a lawyer because I had I had other tools at my disposal. Now I could defend and still do the things that I was doing. I could demonstrate but there’s always been a feeling in the community that lawyers should be cautious about demonstrating-
RH: Right

SW: Because if they get arrested there is nobody to protect the rest of them.

RH: Of course

SW: I didn’t necessarily agree with that, but it made sense. I kinda thought that was a comp out in some ways. If I a lawyer says that I can’t do the demonstration because I gotta protect people. So I would do demonstrations and you know try to not get arrested because you know I didn’t want to not be available to somebody. You know needing a lawyer to appear with them and defend them. So National Conference of Black Lawyers, you know our chapter, we did a lot of that but a lot of chapters were doing that. We didn’t have a lot of chapters- well we had a significant number in those days. But we had a an organization we were involved with you know like uh Linux Hines one of our members in New York, he was actually representing the ANC here in the United States. And so we did a lot of that cause we were very-NCBL was very well respected in the progressive movement. And so we ended representing you know like Angela Davis and a lot of high profile people because people trusted us. And so that’s kinda as a lawyer you move to-you tend to move to defending more than just organizing protests like you would do if you’re not a lawyer. And so I think we did that throughout I mean for example when Mandela got out of prison we sent a delegation to help ensure fair elections. We sent um Shanora Gilbert and Hayward Burns and I think there may have been others. But Shanora Gilbert Hayward Burns were in a fatal car accident while they were in South Africa to protect the elections. So we lost two of our very important members. Shanora was out of the New York Chapter. Hayward Burns was actually one of the founders of the NCBL. So we always had somebody there you know to uh carry out the struggle and at that point the struggle was to make sure the elections were fair so we had people there. But we were on several fronts I mean Africa is just one. I mean we had people that were going to the Middle East that were going as observers and sometimes supporting the Palestinian struggle. We had people going to some parts of the Caribbean during the Grenada attack by the United States; you know monitoring and supporting those struggles. So NCBL has been kinda at the forefront of lawyers because we define ourselves differently.

RH: Right

SW: So I would say after I became a lawyer everything changed. My whole posture has changed pretty significantly. And it still has. I still protect but I unlike most lawyers I still organize as well I still think that’s important. So I go in the community around organize around certain issues and particularly issues around police.

RH: To back track a little how did you react to the election of Ronald Reagan and his policies uh in 82 or uh in 80.

SW: I think I reacted like everybody else did or people of color. I don’t think we understand the significance of Ronald Reagan. We picked up on some of it because immediately he talked about developing-I don’t know if he used these words he may have- developing black capitalism and sending money into the community as a way of solving problems in the black community while wiping out the kind of social net that had developed during the Roosevelt era where people could survive I mean public aid, general assistance all of that. His philosophy was that government should stay out of people’s lives so it meant that the government should stay out of working people’s lives but they should not stay out of the corporate community’s lives as long as they were supporting capitalism and allowing the corporations to do what they want to do. And we began to see that and we started talking about- our group was always very cautious about any support of the notion of black capitalism.

RH: Because it was farfetched or because it just you didn’t think it was going to happen?

SW: For both. It was farfetched because one we were at a different stage of capitalism. We were in monopoly capitalism. And very few companies were going to emerge that were going to be labor intensive enough to hire black workers for example.

RH: Right

SW: Most of the big companies had emerged already. Now this is before the high tech companies but it applies even there. High tech companies aren’t very labor intensive like going to the steel mill.

RH: Right

SW: Um so we knew the statistics you know and there were people in the progressive black community and non black community that were making their arguments that black capitalism didn’t have the capacity. If you took all the black businesses and put them together, statistics show that they only hire you know less than 1% of the black workers for example. So how do you develop black businesses where there gonna hire even 5% of the black workers. It was absurd and what it meant and you know the advantage of developing a kind of international perspective you learn to look at other countries and you learn in many countries- South Africa- not South Africa- but African countries, Asian countries, and Latin American countries, South American countries as well. And what the big monopolies do and the big imperialist countries would do is try to develop a class within those countries that acts as a conduit for American corporations. We called them comprador classes. And we saw that this call for black capitalism was an attempt to develop this comprador class within the black community that the Reagans and others can point to and give support to and that group would began to articulate a whole different ideology about our liberation. And we see a lot of this now. You know these black business people that are republicans and they have these whole different notions about liberation you know they believe in privatizing everything and the civil rights movement is a waste of time and all that. We are totally opposed to that. They don’t want public schools, they want private schooling, they support the privatization movements going on in different parts of the country. And so we saw we begin to see that as a tactic to develop these black business communities, these black business leaders as such, by putting money into the community directed at them rather than putting money into the community directed at the working class generally. Putting money into public schools, putting money into health care put money to job development and on and on.

So they become the leaders of our community or at least a counter leadership to offset the-what I would consider the more progressive leaders that had developed around the labor movement and the civil rights movement and others. They would become the tools of the expansion of capitalism and more importantly they would become the tools of a whole new ideology about that we should move as working people. No longer would we move in conjunction with other working people because we have all this in common we would move to try to develop what I heard Rev. Jackson said “Black wall street” which suggest that he is buying into it as well. So we were opposed to that and I think Reagan was the first to kind of articulate that and uh we didn’t understand right away but it became pretty clear after a while. You know he started wiping out all these other supports that are necessary in a capitalist system and that most capitalist systems have are ways that people can survive and still support themselves and get back into mainstream as possible. And that’s how I kinda began to see Reagan after a while. You know I think his administration changed the whole course of history in terms of social progress. So I think he was-I know a lot of people who think he is the greatest thing since uh you now since Lincoln I guess but I ‘ know I don’t feel that way and I don’t think statistics support it in terms of working people.

RH: Um how did you stay informed about South Africa and the conflict in general during that time during the 80’s?

SW: Well during the 80s-well- I think I read-I read about it, I mean there were- I don’t think New Africa was out then. There’s a publication that I subscribe to now and I think it may have been out. There were publications around you know we didn’t have the internet so we couldn’t go online and check stuff. But there were publications, there were people travelling like I was saying Della Omar were coming and there were many others that came in. Because they couldn’t- they were banned from South Africa

SW: So they came in. There were students you know South African students that were kinda in the mix. So I think the network was strong enough-then at-once the American anti-apartheid movement began to really develop which was mid to late 80s, there was a lot of information because we were taking more of an initiative you know then you started hearing about things that Randall Robinson, you now that that group was doing. And you know a lot of groups were doing a lot of things-trying to pressure this government to isolate South Africa you know so after a while it wasn’t difficult to get information because the movement-there was a movement. There was a very strong movement. Initially I would say the movement was-in the 70s, particularly in the anti colonial movement, which included South Africa, was probably more in the black community than other communities. I don’t think it was mainstream like because people were so bogged down with the anti war work.

RH: Right

SW: But I think by mid 80s it had begin to shift because you began to see a lot of people who probably have spent a lot of time in the-and I don’t know this I haven’t done the statistics of the study but my guess is a lot of people who had been spending a lot of time trying to close down the war many of them probably joined the anti apartheid movement in the mid to late 80s you know and the forces were pretty strong. Particularly those forces to impose a very strict embargo against South Africa because other countries had begun to do it and the United States was late because they supported South Africa to the bitter end.

So I think that’s what happened so just a lot of people. So news and the word and publications were pretty readily available.

RH: Right

SW: And then the other part of it-we moved-my family moved out of Hyde Park in 1980. My wife went to medical school. As soon as she finished medical school in 80 we moved to Oak Park. But the Hyde Park community has always had a lot of information floating around. So when we were over there was always stuff you know information there was no drought. Cause professors-there were professors that were involved in different movements. You find that in university communities you know university communities are always very enlightened communities to be in. I enjoy being in around the university community.

RH: Right

SW: So it wasn’t difficult to get information. And once I guess coming out of University of Chicago and developing networks with people I never had difficulty. Because like I said Prexy reached out to me when he had this young lady from Mozambique that needed some place to stay. We were living in Oak Park then raising our daughters. And then after Mandela was free they sent out delegations of people to study governments because they were trying to figure out you know what form the new South Africa yea. And I remember this young man came from the Alexandra community which is part of Johannesburg and he didn’t have a place to stay and he stayed with us for two months.

RH: O wow.

SW: Yea he just became part of the family. But that was after the election. This is probably 91, 92, 93 something like that. But you know after you become a part of that network you always got information because people are always letting you know what’s going on. And that was before the internet of course I mean before the internet was so popular. Now you know if I turn on my computer now, if it was working, I’m sure I would be getting stuff about some of everything that’s going on right now. It’s a lot easier so it’s in some ways a whole new day in terms of information that we have to learn to use effectively.

RH: So in the late 80s when you were getting all this information, how would you say you used all this information either defending people or otherwise in the way-just in general.

SW: I think I just used it to stay informed. In some ways you know you evolve you don’t stay the same. So by the 80s- the mid 80s-I’m a lawyer now-you know mid 80s-

RH: Right

SW: I have two daughters so I use this information you know to try to pass it on to kids you know get them informed. You might be doing some discussions and forums you know which is for people that are involved you know it’s always constant. For example I was on the-today although I was supposed to be doing this project and spending time with you then I had before I got here I had to spend time with the expert and before I got to him I was on the radio in New York.

RH: O really

SW: Yea so-

RH: Busy man

SW: Yea you know when you involved like that there is always stuff to do. I was on the radio talking about the recent filing of the petition around political prisoners-

RH: Right

SW: And this guy had read the paper and invited me join him so I did. So there’s always stuff-you almost have to just say you know can’t do it, too busy. Like tomorrow for example I was supposed to do deps. in the morning so I think I am going to have my associate do it because at 3 o clock I promised a professor friend of mine at the University of Chicago, Susan Gzesh that I would come and make a presentation to her class, cause she has the human rights group at the University of Chicago.

RH: Ok

SW: So she has this class and she wants them-she wants me to talk about you can begin to bring human rights home you know into your local communities. So I’ll be out there at 3 o clock tomorrow even though I should be doing a lot other stuff like finishing this project.

RH: So you were doing a lot of spreading the word almost at that point?

SW: I think I have forever yea I mean-

RH: That was one of your main goals?

SW: Yea always I mean you always you know as a lawyer you know you- I was a civil rights lawyer right away because I started working at the Peoples’ Law Office. So you have to do your civil rights lawyering-it takes a lot of time. So you don’t have a lot of time to do anything other than if you’re fortunate enough like I was fortunate-the work that you were doing was movement work because we were filing lawsuits against police and organizing against police and the bird torture cases came up and they came up in our office first. So you’re doing that and then other things you kinda fit in. So I wasn’t doing a lot of-not a huge amount of anti apartheid work. If something came along you know if there’s a demonstration or if I knew about a demonstration and people needed lawyers to come to the Consulate you know then I very likely go to the Consulate. But not a lot more than that because as a civil rights lawyer you find yourself very busy advancing civil rights you know filing lawsuits and all of that.
RH: At this time you were participating in divestment?

SW: Yea the divestment movement was going on. That was probably mid 80s I think.

RH: How were you involved? Were you like just-

SW: Probably not a lot. I certainly wasn’t organizing anything. I’m sure I was on panels you know periodically. But still the divestment movements had demonstrations many of them were at the consulate-so we were always dispatched to do that. Sometimes if they were bigger demonstrations you know we would be involved in that and I remember you know on several occasions being at the Consulate. So I would say I spent a lot of time in the late 80s just being available to defend people that were doing demonstrations. I wasn’t doing a lot of demonstrations. It’s a little harder to do them even if you’re not down defending people it’s a lot harder to do demonstrations, organizing them and going to the meetings to organize them when you’re trying to practice law. I found practicing law is pretty demanding.

RH: It seems like it.

SW: Yea so I wasn’t doing a lot of that at that time. But being available I think the movements felt that having the few progressive lawyers that would available to defend was pretty important so. I did it you know my office did it, People’s Law Office did it, we did it. We made a commitment to do it. I think there were 7 of us I think at the time which is more than most offices that would make a commitment to do things like that. Lawyer’s guild, National Lawyers Guild did a lot of work around that. So I would say for the most part-became a lawyer in 83 and except for Consulate work you know forums periodically and just staying advised and trying to get- I spoke to a lot of students during that time, you know I don’t do as much, but I still do quite a bit, particularly law students. You know and I could remember having discussions about Africa and the movement trying to get them involved. But I would say the work around apartheid 90% was more protecting demonstrators and that kind of stuff. And of course the 80s also for me was the time of Harold Washington’s administration.

RH: Right

SW: And when I-

RH: How did you react when he was elected?

SW: I was part of uh- well when he was elected-the first election I was in law school and so we tried to help out as law students. You know you’re limited as law students because it’s such an intense program.

RH: Right

SW: But we brought-I don’t think he came on campus, but we brought somebody from the campaign. We had literature all over campus and discussions and all that. I got out of law school in 83 so I got directly involved in the reelection campaign. And I became one of the coordinators of the Lawyers for Washington, which is some huge number of lawyers I think we had about double hundred lawyers committed to defending Harold. And they had to be coordinated. So that meant that we had to identify lawyers who could go to court-who had the ability to go to court, cause there was always something in court.

RH: Right

SW: And we had to have the resources. So we found firms you know that had lawyers that had resources and you know sit down with them and got a commitment from them to go to court on election day or before election day. Then we had to have lawyers to guard the polling places all over-not all over the city but all over the parts of the city that we considered would be Harold’s votes. Because there were parts of the city that we knew Harold wasn’t getting any votes so there was no point in defending those. But we didn’t want to lose Harold’s votes.

RH: Right

SW: So we had to do that. And we had to have lawyers do research on various issues. And we didn’t have cell phones, we had walkie-talkies. So we on election day we had lawyers all over the city, some lawyers in areas where we didn’t expect Harold to get a lot of votes but we wanted to have somebody there for the few votes. But in the areas where he got votes, we had lawyers available and at the precinct level, which is unheard of, not just at the ward level but the precinct level-available to immediately go in to resolve issues related to polling if we thought it was something that might take away votes from Harold.

RH: Like unfair or unjust-

SW: Yea well polling places opening late.

RH: Right o ok.

SW: Polling places are supposed to open at 6 or 7. If they open at 9 and there in Harold’s district then that’s a problem because you just lost a bunch of folks who would have voted on their way to work.

RH: Right

SW: So then we-we had a command post. Somewhere downtown we had rented this big office space. And we were in touch with all these lawyers all over the city by walkie-talkie because we didn’t have cell phones. And so we would get on the walkie-talkie and say precinct and such and such a precinct and such and such a ward reports that the polling place did not open until 10 o clock, we need you to go to court and get an order-order that polling place to stay open, instead of closing at 7, stay open till 10 o clock. (Snaps) Done.

RH: Nice
SW: And they would go down there and they had an order. And if we saw something that looked like a pattern and it was, I can’t remember what it was but we were getting reports that something was happening that was unusual. And if it was, we would send somebody to court you know we don’t like the way it looks.

RH: Right (laughs)

SW: So you know lots of stuff was happening you know I mean South Africa was still very important but we had a black empowerment-political empowerment movement in Chicago. You know that many of us got actively involved in. I spent more time doing that then I was at my new office but I had a good group of partners and they understood so it was ok. But I still had responsibilities you know I still had to go to court and file stuff and had to do trials and all that. But I just kinda you know me and Lauren H.D. Saucemam, we just kinda took over the coordination because we found a lot of the lawyers were-black lawyers and white lawyers were just there because they were trying to get city business and so they wanted to impress upon Harold that they were helping to get him reelected because they wanted city business. But we weren’t trying to get city business, in fact we had a struggle internally about city business and we decided we wouldn’t because we thought that if we got city business and if the Harold administration-if the Washington administration was not doing what we thought was responsible particularly as it relates to police and all that then we would have to call them out and we thought it would be difficult to call them out if they are paying us at the same time.(Laughs)

RH : (Laughs) Right that’s true. That’s a good point.

SW: So we decided we wouldn’t do city business. So many lawyers did get city business because it’s very attractive to get city business because now you got a contract and you know you’re gonna get paid you know cause you got the largest corporation-at least one of the largest corporations in the city which is the city of Chicago.

RH: Right yea

SW: But we said no we can’t do that. So there’s a lot of stuff going on you know I mean you do- you do it enough to satisfy your sense that you’re being responsible and you’re trying to still move things along at the anti apartheid level. You know I think what I did, and like many others we pretty much decided that our work should be defending demonstrations when we knew about them. But you know we realistically couldn’t do much more than that.

RH: So by the end of the 80s and early 90s that was basically the whole-it you were involved in the anti apartheid movement it was defending demonstrations-

SW: Demonstrations. And many times at the Consulate, and demonstrating at the Consulate because I didn’t accept the idea that I just had to step back and defend.

RH: Right even towards the end.
SW: Yea if there was a demonstration I would and walk the picket line. Now if someone got arrested then I would go you know head over to the jail. So it was kinda double duty you know, but I still feel like I could demonstrate. And we did. I don’t remember very many arrests you know it was-not at the Consulate. There may have been arrests you know at the bigger demonstrations and all that but not at the Consulate. I think the Consulate to the extent to that they had any control over it made the decision they didn’t want to get involved in that they just wanted to be quiet.

RH: Right

SW: You know because if they arrest somebody then that’s a news item you know then we are gonna raise hell about that. And I think they decided no let’s don’t arrest nobody. In fact I think they there were occasions where they just closed down the Consulate early and went home and let us demonstrate.

RH: That’s funny

SW: Cause they didn’t want the bad publicity.

RH: So how did you react to the official ending of apartheid that was-

SW: I was like everybody else-I was very elated. I was- I was reflective, you know it had been a long struggle-many people had died you know. I didn’t know a lot of them but I knew they had died because I had kept up with what was happening on the ground quite a bit through various sources. You know that I was reflective in terms of the sacrifice that the South African people had made you know you think about Mandela doing two decades plus in prison and all that and makes you very reflective. But I was just very happy you know very happy. It brought tears to my eyes just the idea that Mandela was getting out and the South African people were going to get elections. I didn’t at the time have any idea, nobody else did, that even after the elections that the people of South Africa, South African workers were still- that the white South Africans were still going to control 87% of the most arable land productive land and that large numbers of African people would still be locked out of you know their own economy. Because when I went to South Africa in 2001-I went to Durbin- and we went out-side of Durbin they had these shanty towns with no plumbing no nothing just people out there because they were close to Durbin and I guess they could come into town to try find work to survive but there was nothing in these homesteads. So I had no way of foreseeing that so I was just elated because I thought finally the people South Africa after all these decades would just have a new day you know. And to some extent they do but to in another sense they don’t because they are still suffering tremendously after all that struggle.

RH: Right. And you reacted the same way when Mandela was elected president?
SW: Yea. Except we heard about the deaths of Shanora and Hayward Burns I mean that put a damper on it but I mean we were very happy. I mean we knew he would be elected. And then the other damper of course, prior to the elections, weeks prior to the elections-there was an attempt by the right-to disrupt the elections and to force the South African- to force the ANC in particular in to reacting to various acts of violence. You know trying to-

RH: Trying to draw them out?

SW: Well trying to provoke a civil war, that’s what they were trying to do.

RH: Right

SW: To divert and to undermine the upcoming election. So we were concerned about that because there were various acts of violence around. And the one that stands out obviously is the murder of Chris Honey. Chris had been thought of as the successor to Mandela because he led the armed struggle part of the-he was a member of the communist party but he was also a member of the ANC. And to kill Chris-appeared would plunge South Africa into a civil war so we were very concerned about that as we were moving towards the election and we knew about it I mean you know we stayed in touch with what was going on in South Africa on almost a daily basis. So once the election was done and Mandela won and the country did not go into civil war, the Baltilucy (spelling?) people out of Encata which was the Zulu part of the population and the leadership out of that group was pretty reactionary-they were anti ANC because you know they worked with the South African apartheid government against the ANC and all that.

RH: Right

SW: So we were concerned that that might be a problem. So when the election happened and he was elected and you know sworn in and there was no Encata creating stuff of any significance-there’s no civil war, we had lost Chris you know in the murder- assassination but it didn’t stop any thing it didn’t plunge-I think largely due to Mandela’s being able to control things. So it was you know it was kind of bitter sweet in a sense that even after he gets out of prison the people of South Africa still struggling to get to the point where they can say they have a government, they have a president that they chose because there were still reactionary forces to stop that. So you always kind of waiting to exhale. And I mean you exhaled after he was sworn in. And then they had the Truth and Reconciliation and there was all the questions about it-

RH: How did you react to that?

SW: I don’t know you know I kinda understood it but I didn’t like it. I didn’t like the idea that these racists were going to be able to just admit to their violence and racism and just walk away. I thought it was unfair you know because there was a lot of people that were murdered by the apartheid regime and just let them walk away like that. But I understood in the context of the overall international scene at the time because unlike the anti apartheid struggles in the 70s and 80s, there was another force that was available and that was the Soviet Union and the Soviet Block. But the Soviet Union didn’t exist anymore with Mandela. And so the only blocks was the NATO and the western blocks. And so everything changed. If South Africa had taken a stronger position and said we’re gonna you know prosecute all these guys it would have offended the western block because the western block supported apartheid.

RH: Right

SW: So they had to factor all that in. So I you know I had to understand that it was their decisions-we supported the movement but it wasn’t our movement it was their movement.

RH: Right

SW: So you kinda have to let them make decisions about how they proceed and they have to take a lot of stuff into consideration. So you just live with that.
RH: Reflecting do you think there is anything you would have done differently?

SW: In terms of what?

RH: In terms of the whole movement in general. Or I mean-you would have approached it differently or any-

SW: I don’t know I think uh- I’m pretty satisfied with where I am now. I think I’m a late bloomer. You know I didn’t go to college till late I didn’t finish college till late. If I had-when I was raising my daughters and then my son came and my wife and I at the time were working very hard, I was trying to develop a private practice, she was trying to develop as a doctor, we always talked about traveling and going to Africa and maybe getting involved at a different level but we just didn’t have that option. We didn’t have the money, we couldn’t take the kids out of school. I would have liked to for example-I went into a PHD program in Latin American studies at the University of Chicago, the first Latin American studies they had, that they developed. And-you know there were times where I regretted not being able to do like the other students who were single that didn’t have responsibilities that I had- they after the first summer after the first year the first summer we had-I think all of them went to Mexico and studied language all summer. And so when they came back in the fall they were all speaking very well. I didn’t have those options, I had to work, I had children.

RH: Well you have priorities.

SW: Yea and so I couldn’t do all that. So I guess if I could change that I wouldn’t change that by getting rid of my children but it would have made things different cause I would of-I would be speaking Spanish now. And if I was speaking Spanish now I would probably be spending some time-organizing a viable connection between the African American community and least parts of the Latino community because I think there are some areas in common. I think that could-I think I would able to facilitate that better if I was speaking Spanish. And I took time off, me and my son took a class a couple summers ago but it just wasn’t enough and I couldn’t get into it because I was too busy with my practice. So I always wished I could speak Spanish because I know a lot of people-progressives in the Latino community but it ain’t the same if you can go into a community. Because it gives you a certain level of authenticity if you can speak the language.
SW: So you know I regret not being able to spend more time- because in the Latin American studies program you had to- to get your masters you had to pass a language exam which I did but that was all reading-

RH: O.K.

SW: But it was not speaking. And if I had had more time and I didn’t have so many responsibilities I would have definitely- my daughter Akiza when she went to Columbia-she went to Columbus-Columbia. You know I told you we had this student from Columbia, Colleque, Columbia.

RH: Right

SW: She went the next summer. When she came back she was speaking Spanish fluently. But we had had her in classes since she was probably in the first grade, Spanish class. I remember having her in the summer-in language-seeing my other daughter in a language camp. So they had all those advantages that we gave them. And I think she still does. It’s been many many years ago but she says she still hears Spanish she doesn’t speak it that well because she doesn’t use it but she still hears it.

So I would have done that differently. I think the longer shorter I would have done more to- be more involved in other parts of the movement by learning the language-and I think I would have-if I had more time I would study more. You know when I was at U of C I studied a lot more than I study now. And you have to study if you’re involved in a movement. You know especially if you are part of the leadership- you have to study to help people- you see in my community I know for sure that I am seen as a progressive lawyer who has a certain amount of respect in other communities. You know in the progressive white community, the Palestinian community, the Puerto Rican community, to some extent some parts of the Mexican community. So unlike many I have an international base in that sense. It would be a deeper base and it would be a base that I can probably help my community to understand better and maybe adopt in some ways if I had more time to study. You know struggle and study goes hand in hand. You know I got many books but I just don’t ever have time to study. I would like to know more about for example the whole immigration issue. I would like to know more about it. I would like to argue on behalf of immigration, but I would like to be able to argue some of the economic issues that relate to immigration that I know exist that I just don’t know how to study. You know I know the immigration policies of the United States have affected certain sectors in Mexico that has made it very difficult for Mexican workers to work because of the trade policies. And it has forced Mexicans out of certain sectors because there are no jobs. Now you know if many people understood those dynamics they might see the immigration issue a little differently because to some extent we helped cause it.

I would like to study and know more about the whole Palestinian/Israeli issues. I know a lot but I don’t know enough. You know and I have books that if I took time to study I would know more so I can be clearer on some of the issues and be able to articulate them. Because I see myself as one that helps bring information to my community so I would do more of that but this law office keeps me very busy, more than I want to be. I don’t particularly enjoy being busy with law. I mean it’s what I do, I’m pretty good at it but it doesn’t excite me, it never has that much just doing the research and the briefs-

RH: For individual cases and stuff like that?

SW: No it’s not that it’s just that I can’t- I went to school to be a historian- I like history. I love to get a history book and just spend a weekend reading it. But I’m so bogged down with keeping the law practice going and reading law and making arguments and appellate briefs and all this stuff, which I have to do. I don’t do it with a great deal of excitement because I think I’m historian by- I wouldn’t say by nature but by training. I love history. And it reinforces my political work you know. But if you gotta run a practice you gotta run a practice. So if I could do that over again somehow if I wasn’t so tied down with the legal work and I could do more thinking, more writing. I was asked to write a section of a book that I alluded to earlier and the book was gonna be published by Third World Press and it was gonna be about black activism in Chicago from 1960 to 75 and I was asked to write a section. Like a personal political biography. And I was excited about it and I started researching meaning going into my own personal archives, digging out stuff but I just didn’t have the time. You know I pulled out a lot of stuff, did a little writing and then I just ran out of time. And I haven’t been able to get back to it. But I was excited about doing that, I enjoy doing it. So if I had more time to do it I think I would love to do it but I don’t see the time right now-no time soon. Because I’ve got trials every month this year except July-the month of July. So it’s a lot.
RH: Um to keep reflecting, how has being an activist changed you as a person over the course of I guess your activism years?

SW: I don’t remember otherwise I guess I’ve been an activist so long. (Pause) For sure two things changed me. Two streams of thought. One stream of thought is black nationalism. That stream of thought gave me a different view of myself as a black man, as a member of the black community, as a member of the human family-coming out of with my origins in Africa. And that’s a positive thought, it’s something that I have embraced, it’s caused me to study Africa and see the African world probably differently than most people. So that’s the first school of thought. Another school of thought is the thinking of my connection with other working people. You know the connection that I developed as I studied you know socialism, socialist ideas and stuff like that. And that’s very important too. Both of those are very strong. One gives me the ability to understand and examine things-phenomenal-social phenomena by looking at classes and looking at class kind of conflicts. And the other one gives me a very different and the same perspective in looking at the issues of race you know and how race plays its way out through everything in the United States. So the combination of the two I think gives me a balance. And I didn’t have that as I was growing up. I didn’t develop that until I became an activist. So as an activist now having all that and the experience that I’ve had, I know I’ll die as an activist. I know I won’t retire because it’s not something you retire from.

SW: You know you keep pushing and you keep organizing you keep doing what you do until you can’t do it no more because that’s your life. So that how it changes-you are transformed over a period of time and you don’t go back. I don’t see how you could go back. I’ve been doing what I do since I first organized that little drive in 1965 to feed people in the south. And that’s been many many years-that was before most of my kids were born and all of that. And so you transform and I like who I am because I know-because I see how other people are and don’t particularly like who they are. You know I see people who have distanced themselves from any struggle. I see people who like lawyers for example are just trying to practice law because they hope they can get rich one day. They don’t want to have anything to do with anybody’s struggle. They don’t want have anything to do with anything except trying to posture-you know to be successful and wealthy one day. So you can’t even talk to them about struggle-they don’t have a clue. I’m not that and I would not be happy being that kind of person. So I am glad of who I am. I’m different and I know it and they know it because I hear it all the time, but that’s alright you know. I’m pretty comfortable in my difference. I make a lot of sacrifices but I think that’s what’s you’re supposed to do.
So the movement has- the struggle involvement has changed me you know I have a good sense of what’s going on in my community, outside of my community-outside the community you know in different parts of the world. Sometimes if I’m just in the community-I might be walking down the street- it’s not uncommon for somebody to stop me and say aren’t you Stan Willis? And I say yea and I say who are you, and we you know shake hands and-

RH: Celebrity.

SW: Yea yea well I guess you can call it that but I think it’s just the recognition that here’s somebody that we know is fighting on our behalf. I think that’s how they see that. And sometimes they just say god bless you keep doing what you’re doing. And I like that. And I like to be that kind of person that’s the kind of person I want to be. And you know that’s the kind of person I intend to always be. I can’t see anything that would drastically change that. I think I rather be that person than one who is in this office now who is just trying to scrape out and find a way to find great wealth one day. Because you gotta look at yourself in the mirror you know. You know all these problems are going on. You know there are people starving in the United States, you walk out of here you are going to see homeless people, you know that children are not being educated in the city of Chicago, you know that the prisons are filling up with black men and Latino men and if you’re not doing anything about it then I think that’s a problem. I really do. I mean we are all connected.

So I think my involvement has changed me forever. And I’m glad of it you know.

RH: What would you say you are most proud of on that note?

SW: Most proud of?

RH: Yea

SW: (Pause) I don’t know really. I think I’m proud that uh-I’m proud to be here. I’m proud that I went through what I’ve gone through in terms of the work I’ve done. Some of it has been done very well, I’ve learned a lot. I’ve learned a lot by myself. I’ve learned about how to be healthy which I think is critical. I don’t know very many to be quite frank-I don’t know too many-very many 68 year old men or women for that matter who get up every morning, rain, shine, snow or sleet, and run a mile or two every morning, who is very careful about what they and careful about getting sleep and all that. And it’s not a fad it’s just the way I live, I’ve been living this way for a while. And I’m pretty healthy you know I lift-I do my work out in the morning. Typically my workout is -right now because it changes it evolves-I usually do 20 sit-ups or more. I do 50-right now 50 to 60 sometimes 70 pushups.

RH: I couldn’t even do that many.

SW: Most people can’t. That’s what I’m saying. And then I do some yoga stuff you know stretching and breathing. And I lift some light weights just for muscle development-15 bar bells that kind of stuff. And then I go and run every morning. And I like being that way. And then I’m careful about food. I cook my own food typically; I hardly ever buy anything from restaurants. You saw me eat that sandwich that’s not common with me. I typical cook because my son is at home and he cooks a little bit and I cook for both of us. And I like it like that. My food-vegetables, fish, you know poultry I buy at whole foods so I don’t absorb chemicals you know I think that’s important.

So I think you know I have evolved to be close to the person-you know there is still a lot of work to do but in some ways I’m pretty close to the person that I think I should be you know in terms of how I eat, how I sleep. My relationships with people are pretty wholesome. My children are-my relationship with my children is very solid. I am very supportive. They are very supportive of me. My daughter Akiza is pretty political, my daughter Eisha is not. You know that’s fine. My fiancé is very political, very supportive and I’m very supportive. So things are pretty good. But it’s you know there’s still politics and struggle you know it’s a lifestyle. You know even the food you eat I think -the fact that you decide that you want to find a way to contribute to a better environment. So I had this discussion with my son about how can we do that. Let’s start getting rid of some of this plastic you know start bringing-you know that kind of stuff. I think that’s part of-people who have been in the struggle evolve to try to live for the future, try to contribute to the future. And I like that about myself and I’m glad that I did that and I’m glad I am who I am right now.

RH: That’s cool. Um two more questions actually: what event or person was the most influential in your experience as an activist?
SW: Uh two people. No event that I can think of. One person: Malcolm X. Very important, his speeches, his persona, his commitment to the struggle, his outlook about-especially after he left the nation of Islam he talked about the world struggle, he talked about the world revolution which you know was realistic. And he died as a result of it. I think history maybe at some point will figure out the connection between his death and the United States government. And then the other person was a friend of mine. His name is Bob Rhoads. Bob Rhoads introduced me to socialist thought. He was a theoretician. He was-we met at the University of Chicago. He was studying philosophy. And we had these classes and we studied because we all were activists. And he was the person who led the classes-he was the one who really understood the theory and attempt to explain it. We are still friends. We were together last weekend. And so he took me in a whole different direction. As a working class young man, to know that there-theoretical-social theoretical ways of looking at myself as part of a working class community. You know and that also feeds into one’s way of struggling. I didn’t know that-it was new. He was very good-he was very helpful.

So those two people I would say contributed more to my outlook, because there’s a nationalist part of it comes from Malcolm and then you know kind of international outlook that I am embracing now through the human rights movement. And then there was Bob Rhoads who introduced another layer on that and that’s the layer of class struggle and working class people. In fact I was honored last night at the Coalition of Black Trade Unionist had their annual banquet and I was given an award as a-they give a community service-most of the awards they give are to people in the trade union movement and they had this one award that they give to someone they think is contributing to the community- community service award. And they honored me by giving me the community service award last night at a banquet. So that was a nice gesture, good feeling. So those are the two I would say that had the greatest influence you know then anybody.

RH: Um ok last question that I have written down, what do you still think needs to be done in South Africa?

SW: I think there has to be a way, hopefully a non violent way- I don’t know if it’s possible-that the people who fought for a new South Africa are able to participate in a new South Africa-that is the mass of people who are still living in these shanty towns- I think there has to be some form of land distribution-redistribution. It’s unfair that the people who benefitted from apartheid still benefit from apartheid you know from their relationship. Now for sure there are some black people and some who were part of the anti apartheid movement who have become very well off because they were able to get in, they had contacts with the ANC and they started businesses. And that’s fine, I think that’s fair. But it’s unfair that the land is not redistributed, that the masses of black Africans are still really struggling after going through an anti apartheid movement and it’s going to resolve itself in some way. There have been more people focused on Zimbabwe because of land distribution which I think is unfair. But there have been more white farmers killed in South Africa then there have even close than Zimbabwe. There have been over 100 (unknown word) over the land. In Zimbabwe I think there have been probably 3 or 4. But the western world has decided to attack Zimbabwe I think largely because of the land distribution. And they don’t want to see that as a pattern, because if you distribute land without a reaction to the western world, then you might decide to distribute or take over the oil and the box site and all these other resources. So I think they are sending this message because there’s no other reason. Cause you can say well Mugabe has been in office 25 years. Well so have three or four other leaders on the continent but they are not attacking them. So I think it’s just focused on the whole land thing. And they never talk about the land they talk about president Mugabe took the land from the white farmers but they don’t talk about where the white farmers got the land from. And of course they took it from the African people so it’s unfair. But the reason Mugabe is supported by the leadership of almost-all over the continent is because they know it’s unfair. And they know that land should be redistributed you know. And it would have been if the west had committed more resources in this case in Zimbabwe.

So I would like to the people in South Africa benefit from the resources in South Africa and they’re not, not the black South Africans. And that’s was what the whole fight was about. So until it happens-I would rather see it not happen as a result of civil war but I think that’s more up to the people who are controlling the land and these western powers who could very easily say ok let’s intervene in some way and work with the South African government and try to figure out a way to help assist to avoid a civil war. They could do that but they don’t. So we’ll see. But that’s the sad commentary that we at this point after all this struggle-but of course Americans never were supporting the anti apartheid movement you know the government was forced. So, so that’s what I would like to see. I don’t know how that could happen yet but uh-it might end up with a lot of violence and a lot of people dying you know that don’t have to die if there was more proactivity on part of the western countries. Because they ultimately are the countries that benefitted at least the corporations benefitted, not working people so much in the western countries. Well-

RH: Is there anything else you would like to add at the end of this interview?

SW: No I don’t think so. It was some thought provoking questions. Did you come up with that all by yourself?

RH: Ha some of them yes.
SW: That was very thought provoking.

RH: I’m not as dumb as I look.

SW: No you don’t look dumb I mean I know a little bit about your school, you came from a good school and um-so tell me about your jazz, how did you get into jazz?

RH: We will talk about that right-

SW: After you turn off the tape recorder.
